ENHANCED REMOVAL OF CHROMIUM (VI) FROM POLLUTED WATER USING ACTIVATED CARBON
Oguri Sreedevi

Department of Chemistry, Dr. A. P. J. Abdul Kalam University, Indore

Abstract- Activated carbon made from the stems of the Lantana camara plant is used in batch methods of extraction to remove chromium (Cr) (VI) from contaminated water (ACSLC). pH, initial Cr (VI) concentration, sorbent dosage, temperature, equilibration period, and co-ion presence are the ideal extraction conditions. The discovered adsorption capacity of 26.25 mg/g is greater than that of sorbents previously mentioned in the literature. With just a slight reduction in adsorption capacity, the used adsorbent can be revived and used once more. Field emission scanning electron microscopy (FESEM), X-ray diffraction (XRD), and Fourier-transform infrared (FT-IR) techniques are used to investigate the active carbon. Numerous isotherm models are used to investigate the sorption mechanism, and it is discovered that the Freundlich model adequately captures the adsorption process. Studies on thermodynamics demonstrate that physisorption is spontaneous and endothermic. The pseudo-second-order model accurately describes the adsorption kinetics. The developed methodology is effective when used with effluent samples from various industries.

Keywords: Active Carbon, Adsorbent, Adsorption, Chromium (VI), Polluted Water.
